LOTHAIR.

What our Louisvi Correspondent Thinks of Disraell's Great Work.

Louisville, August 23.—Though only a young woman, a strong desire has taken possession of me to send you my views of "Lothair," which very able book I have heard so much criticised, so much said for and against it, so unjustly abused, that I have concluded, with great hesitation of course,

When I learned to read well enough to interest myself, I formed my taste for light literature upon so charming a model as the "Young Duke," the result of which was a wholesome literary taste and good digestion, for at the age of fifteen such sickly sentimentality and bad morals as Ernest Maltravers and Alice, or the Mysself and sentiment of the exact number of oysters and glasses of champagne each Senator bolted. Maltravers and Alice, or the Mysteries, had no attraction for me, usually so seductious and fascinating to the young. Everything from the pen of Disrsell I have read with pleasure and profit therefore feel that ure and profit, therefore feel that I The New York Times of yesterday concerning the profit of my favorable opinion of his much shussed "Lathair". And the Mon Signori; what cultivated, agreeable and improving companion. Last, though not least, "Theodora." What language can sufficiently convey an idea of this exquisite conception, dead, I grant, but nevertheless beautiful, with a large beart, a great soul, a splendid intellect. What more could the heart of man ask or consisve. Her early life is shrouded in mystery, but whatever was the nature of her education, is result upon her character was preciation of her, I very much fear as be sometimes found him a bore; but look on the bright side. That of Lothair and Theodora was anomalous, but Disraell meant to make it as pure as the snow drift, to be refining and improving to him, without being injurious to her. In the atmosphere of such purity, an impure thought would have been sacriligeous, and impos-sible-for the material was lost in the intellectual, the grosser nature in the refined and elevated. Still "Cesar's wife must be above suspicion," and Mrs. Grundy is rarely if ever indulneartily deplore. Theodora, believing that in dying she could say fare-well to Lothair as to a brother; still,

All dissentions are at an end in the French Senate and Assembly. Nothing is thought of but war and the defense of Paris.

The different German nationalities quarrel with one another, and the soldiers of each State are kept in separate camps.

Prussian wounded at Saarbruck and Saar Louis were so numerous and so disastious was the situation that the Prussian authorities were ferced to send them to Cologne and Dusseldorf; but, owing to the fact that the armies needed the railway clear for reinforcements and provisions, the wounded were conveyed through Belgium and Luxemburg without notifying those Governments until the wounded were under way.
